TABLE OF ROOTS.

THE term 'Root' is used in different senses. It is sometimes supposed to designate an original element of language; the first form in which a thought vaguely clothed itself in articulate sound. In this sense, however, there can be no roots in any language known to us; for these languages consist substantially of groups of words transmitted, with modifications, from older languages. Such groups, and the words composing them, can often be traced back for ages before the languages arose to which they belong; but still as words and groups of words, as verbs, substantives, pronouns, etc.—with no direct evidence that the so-called roots are older than the words which contain them.

In this book the term 'Root' simply designates that element, common to all the words of a group of kindred meaning, which remains after formative additions are removed. Thus, in Latin, we find a group of words which relate to guidance or government, such as regō, rēx (i. e. regs), rēgnum, rēgnō, rēgula, regia; and a group which relate to standing or fixedness, as stō, statō, status, statim, stabulum, stabilis. Now in either group, apart from the elements in any word which make it a verb or a substantive or otherwise specialize its meaning, the core of the word, that which is felt to contain the fundamental notion or suggestion which is common to the whole group, is the syllable REG- or STA-, and this accordingly we call the Root. The use of the term must not be understood to imply that Latin roots ever had an independent existence, as parts of speech.

When we find that different languages fall into groups whose roots are substantially common, we infer with certainty that these languages had a common origin. Since this relationship has been proved, in different degrees, among a multitude of languages, including the Sanscrit, Persian, Greek and Latin, the Slavonic, Scandinavian, Celtic and Germanic tongues, scholars recognize in these a class, called the Aryan or Indo-Germanic languages; all of which must be modifications or developments, more or less remote, of one original language, spoken in early times by common ancestors of the Aryan races. Some philologists have thought it possible, by studying the speech of existing peoples, and the recorded fragments of the speech of others, to determine the laws of development and change, so as in a great measure to reconstruct the original Aryan language. Their efforts in this direction have been fruitful of interesting and suggestive results; but no agreement has been reached concerning the nature or form of the original vocabulary. These efforts have been founded too largely upon the study of written words, which are imperfect symbols of what is uttered and heard; while a scientific inquiry into the laws of change in language requires a study of the organs of speech, and of their work, products, and habits in the intercourse of life.

The following Table, therefore, is presented merely as an aid to the student in grouping Latin words under their simplest significant elements; and then in associating the groups with those in which the same elements have been discovered in Greek, German, and English. For this purpose the principal words of the vocabulary, whose relationships are known, are brought into kindred groups, each under its Root, with an occasional indication of the connecting link supposed to have existed at some period between forms which appear isolated in our fragmentary records. All forms, thus assumed to account for others, and of the actual use of which there is no direct evidence, are marked with an asterisk. When a parallel group is found in Greek—that is, one in which the meanings, forms, and history of the words show that it must, in some earlier stage of development, have been one with the Latin group—the most important or most suggestive of its words are placed immediately after the root. Parallel groups found in English or German are afterwards indicated, by a selection of words for comparison. These selections in English are, of course, limited to words which have come to us independently of the Latin. Words which come into English or French from Latin are referred to in but a few instructive instances.

Most of the Roots in our Table are predicative or verbal Roots; that is, each of them, in connection with certain formative elements, is found in a group of complete words, including verbs and nouns, of definite meaning, the Root itself suggesting, in the consciousness of the speaker and the hearer, a general notion of action or being, out of which, by a process of specialization or integration, each of these definite meanings may have arisen. But there are also a few Roots or elements which, as Max Müller says, 'merely point to an object in space and time, and express what we express by here, there, then, this, etc. In their primitive form and intention they are addressed to the senses rather than to the intellect. They are sensuous, not conceptual.' These are known as pronominal stems or demonstrative roots, each of them being the common element in a group of 'symbolic' words; that is, of pronouns, conjunctions, prepositions, and particles indicating, not actions nor objects, but relations.

NAMES OF PERSONS AND PLACES

MET IN THE LATIN AUTHORS COMMONLY STUDIED IN THE FIRST TWO YEARS OF THE COLLEGE COURSE

COMPILED BY

HUGH MACMASTER KINGERY, PH.D.

PROFESSOR OF THE LATIN LANGUAGE AND LITERATURE

WABASH COLLEGE

THERE is, of course, a considerable diversity of usage among the colleges in regard to the work of freshman and sophomore years, but the range covered in this list is believed to be sufficiently wide to meet all needs. In prose the following authors and works are included:—

Cicero: De Senectute, De Amicitia and the letters in the volumes of selections edited by Abbott, Kirtland, and Riess.

Livy: Books I, XXI, XXII entire, with the portions of other books contained in Burton's Selections.

Pliny: The letters in volumes of selections by Westcott, Merrill, Kingery.

Tacitus: The Annals, Histories, Agricola and Germania.

In verse the following:

Catullus: Entire.

Elegiac Poets: In Harrington's edition.

Horace: Entire.

Plautus: Aulularia, Captivi, Menaechmi, Miles Gloriosus, Mostellaria, Pseudolus, Rudens, Trinummus.

Terence: Entire.

Roman names are grouped under the nomina, but cognomina and agnomina are listed in their alphabetical order, with references to the proper gentile name. Under each nomen the arrangement is this: (1) Persons having, so far as is known, no praenomen or cognomen; these are in chronological order. (2) Those having nomen and praenomen; in alphabetical order of praenomina, but when several have the same praenomen their order is chronological. (3) Those having cognomina; in alphabetical order of cognomina and arranged as before with reference to praenomina and order of time. The same principles prevail when an *agnomen*¹ is introduced. Illustrations may be found in the lists under any of the great gentile names, such as Claudius, Cornelius, Iulius, Valerius.

¹ The agnomen is an additional name given, or assumed, to distinguish individuals having the same cognomen (that is, the name belonging to all members of a family, as Scipio); e.g. Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus.

Adjectives follow, in the same paragraph, the nouns to which they relate. In many cases the noun is derived from the adjective, or was itself originally an adjective; the arrangement here adopted is not, therefore, etymological, but merely convenient.

Familiarity with inflections given in the Latin grammars is assumed, and the genitive of a name is indicated only when it is likely to be unfamiliar.

From one to three references are given with each name to places where it occurs in the works covered. Usually its earliest occurrence in the work quoted is noted; to give all would of course be entirely impossible. In these references the following abbreviations are used:—

A. Cicero, Epistulae ad Atticum .	Pla.Mo. Plautus, Mostellaria .
